A Joyful Salute to Christine Ann “Chrissy” Kardos

January 28th, 1964 - February 27th, 2026

“I love you more.”

We celebrate the beautiful life of Christine Ann “Chrissy” Kardos, a woman who met every day with kindness and bright energy. Her presence lit up rooms, and her caring spirit left a lasting mark on everyone she met.

Chrissy was born in Hempstead, New York on January 28th, 1964. Her Catholic faith guided her path, shaping her generous outlook and steady resilience.

Travel meant family time for Chrissy; she happily criss-crossed miles to hug loved ones. At home, she poured the same love into caring for her pets, showing creative flair in making every space safe and warm for them.

Her heart’s greatest pride was her family. She cheered on her daughters Victoria, Vanessa, and Virginia, and beamed at every milestone celebrated by her grandsons Joseph and Zack.

Chrissy’s circle was anchored by her caregiver Ed, who shared in her generous spirit. She now joins her mother, Virginia, in peaceful rest, while her family carries forward her supportive and resilient example.

As we gather our favorite memories, we echo Chrissy’s own parting words: “I love you more.” May we honor her by spreading the same kindness and creativity she shared so freely.

Shortly after mom lost her beloved dog Lambchop, she visited me in Pittsburgh and it was the first time she was meeting Tim. Tim came over and roughly 2 minutes after meeting her, he gave his condolences and made her cry. At roughly minute 15 or so, she was playing Mother of Three Daughters, the song that Vanessa had gifted her for Christmas, and cried. At roughly minute 30, she was telling Tim that she "knows people" and could make him "disappear." I love telling this story because I feel like it perfectly encapsulates mom. Mom was lively, she was clever, and she was passionate about the people who she loved. She reveled in our wins as if they were own and gave us words of encouragement through our losses— lots and LOTS of words. She was generous and she was resilient, and a little bit scary if you messed with her daughters. Now, losing mom has become my sacred wound- and just as my mom did when I was a child, I will nurse that wound. I will keep it clean but won't worry when it's weepy, because mom told me that is the what the body does when it needs care. I will learn to live with my wound when it's painful and be patient when it burns, because mom taught me to be strong. I will find beauty in the scar that my wound will create because just like mom, it will always be a part of me and is the enduring, sacred honor of what was lost. Mom loved celebrating and bringing joy to holidays, including St Patrick's day. She'd make corned beef and wear all green and swore it was because we are Irish, but I'm still not convinced. Her favorite though was Christmas. So, Mom, I hope everyday is Christmas where you are. A day filled with comfort, love, joy, warmth, peace, and celebration- over and over and over again.

I never got the chance to meet Christine, but I feel like I did because I recognize her best qualities – her uniqueness, her protection and commitment to her animals, her fierce loyalty to the ones she loves, her sensitivity, and her curiosity for other people – in her daughter, my friend. I also feel like I know her voice, just in that distinct way native New Yorkers pronounce the name of their chosen paradise – Flah-rida. Her essence continues in her children, family, and the people who knew her and of her and I imagine she's already found a pronunciation for her newest paradise.

How can I pick 1 memory out of a lifetime of memories???When you walked in the door you never knew what chaos or challenge was waiting for you. Its been a hell of a ride and I would not trade it for anything. Even being divorced for 26years gave me the opportunity to become who I am now and put all those hard times behind me. Over these past years we actually became friends and we were there for each other during difficult times. Our daughters were the light of her life, they were her pride and joy,and you would hear how proud of all 3 girls she was, I heard it 50 times a day. Even the girls friends were "adopted" and have been in contact with her thru social media. She always took care of everyone regardless of age, or when the last time she saw you. And ended every conversation with our girl with "I Love you more" . I miss you

It feels impossible to choose a single "fondest" memory when I've been blessed with 38 years of them. Every season of my life has her fingerprints on it. Every memory feels sacred because it has her love woven through it. My mom was endlessly, unapologetically proud of me and my sisters. She would brag about us to anyone who would listen, even to those who didn't ask. Even in the hospital, when she was the one who needed care, she still made sure every doctor and nurse who entered her room knew who we were and what we did for a living. Even then, she was introducing us with that spark in her eyes, as if our accomplishments were her greatest trophies. She always said she did three things right in life—meaning me and my sisters. I hope she knew how deeply that shaped us. We grew into women she could be proud of because she first believed we were worth bragging about. She made life fun and magical in the simplest ways, "scavenger hunting", birthday parties, holiday traditions, little surprises that made ordinary days feel special. She taught us that love wasn't just something you felt, it was something you showed consistently, loudly, and without hesitation. We never ended a phone call without saying "I love you." And she'd always reply, "I love you more." She taught me that love is unconditional. That you fight for the people you love. That family is everything and you hold them close, always. I am so grateful she was there for the milestones, cheering me on through promotions, helping me shop for my wedding dress, visiting me when I moved away from home. I'm grateful for the times she house-sat so I could travel, even if it sometimes meant coming home to a dog mysteriously dyed green. That was her: loving, generous, and just a little bit goofy. I could never be more thankful for the incredible, kind, funny, selfless human I was lucky enough to call Mom. She was my safe place, my loudest cheerleader, my constant "I love you more." And I will carry that love with me for the rest of my life.

One of my favorite things about Chrissy was the way that she could transform an ordinary moment into one filled with overflowing wonder and joy. The picture featured here is from when Virginia and I brought Chrissy to have high tea when she was visiting us in Indianapolis. The place was nice, certainly, but the energy that Chrissy brought to the experience was on a whole other level altogether. She practically waltzed around the place as if she were a princess going to her first ball, sipping her tea with pinkies up and excitedly chatting with the staff and other tea-drinkers nearby, whether they wanted to be chatted with or not. The wonder that she showed in moments like these was so very contagious and brought all of those around her up to the higher plane that she operated on. I think we have a lot to learn from her in this regard. Many of us leave this sense of wonder behind after childhood, but Chrissy did not. She kept on being her wonderful self. I hope we can all be a little more wonderful like her. Love you Chrissy and hope that you're spreading your wonder with an angel at the next table over, whether they wanted to be chatted with or not.
